cordially invite you to participate in a roundtable discussion on

‘Social Transformation: How far have we come? How far still to go?’

Calls for transformation in higher education, the judiciary, our sports teams, the media, and in almost every other sector, are as loud as ever. Does this imply that, 21 years into democracy, we have failed to make significant progress? If so, how can we improve matters?

Adding to the challenge is the fact that, all too often, the transformation debate is conducted predominantly on racial terms. Where does that leave issues of gender, disability, class and the rural/urban divide? Lastly, can we identify an end-point for transformation, or will our society always be in need of it?
